

We all love a SNOWGLOBE. But they are deadly for dogs.

A grieving dog trainer is urging owners to bin their snow globes as her own pets died just hours apart - after lapping up the liquid when one of the ornaments smashed. Caroline Osbourn had worked hard to puppy-proof her home after welcoming playful 17-week-old labrador Milo and was certain nothing at home could harm him or her two other dogs.

Caroline heard a crash coming from her kitchen and as she rushed into the room Milo and her seven-year-old rescue dog Lexi were lapping up the liquid from a photo snow globe. As she frantically tried to clean up the mess, she noticed the clear fluid felt both 'oily and sticky' and after a quick search online found the spherical trinkets often contain anti-freeze.

According to The Kennel Club, anti-freeze is extremely poisonous to dogs and can cause brain, lung and kidney damage. They note the liquid can taste sweet making it 'irresistible'. After a call with an animal toxicology team, Caroline rushed her two dogs to the vet where they were given medication to make them sick before being put on a drip - with the business owner certain they would recover with treatment.

But the following day, the mum-of-two was forced to say goodbye to both of her adored pets after they died six hours apart on Christmas Eve.

Now, Caroline is urging all dog owners to throw out their snow globes to avoid their own animals facing a similar heart-breaking fate.

"It was Milo's first Christmas and my two dearest friends died because of a Christmas Ornament."

PLEASE, DO NOT HAVE THEM IN THE HOUSE.
